1. SUBTROPICAL STORM ALBERTO – UPDATE ONE

May 25, 2018

We are monitoring subtropical storm Alberto and are taking actions to keep our people and assets safe.

As a precautionary measure, Shell is minimizing the number of staff working offshore on our platforms in the Eastern Gulf of Mexico. We are also securing our facilities in preparation for potentially severe weather. This includes safely shutting in production at our Ram Powell hub located in the Viosca Knoll area of the Gulf of Mexico.

There are currently no impacts to our production or drilling operations in the Mars Corridor or other areas of the Eastern Gulf of Mexico.

As always, our top priority is the safety of our people, the environment and our assets.

2. SUBTROPICAL STORM ALBERTO – UPDATE TWO

May 26, 2018

We are monitoring subtropical storm Alberto and are taking actions to keep our people and assets safe.

As a precautionary measure, Shell evacuated all offshore personnel from its Ram Powell hub in the Viosca Knoll area and our Appomattox hub in the Norphlet. We have also safely suspended production operations at Ram Powell. There are currently no other impacts to our production or drilling operations in the Mars Corridor or other areas of the Eastern Gulf of Mexico.

As always, our top priority is the safety of our people, the environment and our assets.

Note – Appomattox is Shell's newest deepwater production hub in the U.S. Gulf of Mexico and is expected to begin production by the end of the decade. The platform recently arrived in the Norphlet, which is located in the Eastern Gulf of Mexico. Appomattox is designed to safely withstand hurricane force conditions.

3. SUBTROPICAL STORM ALBERTO – UPDATE THREE

May 28, 2018

Shell has begun to safely redeploy personnel to its assets in the Eastern Gulf of Mexico.

We will resume production operations at Ram Powell once we can verify it is safe to do so.

As always, our top priority is the safety of our people, the environment and assets.

This will be our final update for Alberto.
